Soul Psychology - Energetic Synthesis

To paraphrase Plato elsewhere, his Phaedrus suggests our soul is like a chariot "driven" by two horses, the horse of passion and the horse of reason; the horse of passion is needed to move us toward our desires but the horse of reason examines and qualifies those desires, honing desire by a sense of what is right. [6]

Ancient Classical Roots of Psychology - Electrum Magazine

Prior to the late 1800s, psychology was the study of our inner mental life—the study of our soul, our deepest self, and our essence. Over time, the discipline became an academic and clinical field with a strong focus on pathology, rather than spiritual development. The discussion was interesting, as Goldsmith views "neurosis" as the whole organism's natural response to developmental stress on the path to maturation, rather than as pathology.
