Emotions In History Lost And

There are many ways in which emotions get lost. An individual can lose them as a direct result of a traumatic incident. Some of us might know someone who has undergone successful brain surgery. The tumour is gone, everybody is happy, except for the patient who can no longer experience happiness or sadness.

It sees emotions and emotional styles fade away and get lost (like honour or acedia), but it also witnesses the emergence of new or newly framed emotions. Empathy and sympathy/compassion serve as great examples of emotions that are “found” and “invented” in the modern period. They are therefore addressed in the book's third chapter.

The concept of “lost” emotions is somewhat problematic, though. According to the physicists' laws of conservation, nothing is ever lost in history. Cultural memory allows us to store ideas and concepts that have lost their practical appeal, and enables them to reappear in different forms, guises and meanings.

In An Emotional History, the periodization is again threefold: there are “changes in the decades around 1800 and again around 1920.”[21] This is a very narrow time frame. Emotionology, touted as a “boost” to the larger effort of getting at emotions in history, in fact boosts essentially the period that created emotionology.[22]
